THE CALL

DISCOVERY TO CLOSE

A phase-by-phase walkthrough for selling a website build to a med spa or aesthetics clinic — from the first ninety seconds to the signature. Built to be read on your phone while the phone is ringing.

MED SPA & AESTHETICS

ONE MEETING · 45-55 MIN

CASE-STUDY OFFER

THREE RULES THAT HOLD FOR EVERY PHASE

- I They talk seventy percent of the time. If you are talking more than they are, you are losing.
- II Every number in your pitch is a number they gave you. You do arithmetic. You do not do estimates.
- III Say the real price before you say the discount. A discount from an unstated price is just being cheap.

You are not allowed to open this call without having spent ten minutes inside their business. Everything in Phase 3 depends on what you collect here.

COLLECT AND WRITE DOWN

- The tap count. Open their site on your phone and book an appointment. Count every tap from homepage to confirmed. Write the number down — you will quote it back to them.
- The booking system. Vagaro, Boulevard, MindBody, Jane, or a phone number. If it's a phone number, that's your whole pitch.
- Their ranking. Google [treatment] + [city]. Where do they land? Screenshot it.
- Instagram. Follower count, posting cadence, and whether the link in bio goes to a real site or a Linktree.
- Three review quotes. Read their five-star Google reviews. The words clients use to praise them are the words that belong on their homepage. Steal three.
- One specific flaw. Something you can name in a sentence — the gallery loads slow, the pricing page is a PDF, the site is a template three other clinics in town are using.

OPEN ON YOUR SCREEN BEFORE YOU DIAL

Their site · your site · your calendar · this document · a blank page for their numbers.

Kill the sales-call energy and buy permission to ask questions for the next twenty minutes.

“Thanks for making the time. Here's how I'd like to use the next thirty minutes, if it works for you — I want to ask about how people actually find you and book you, because I don't want to pitch you something you don't need. If there's something worth building, I'll show you exactly what it is and what it costs. If there isn't, I'll tell you that and give you your time back. Fair?”

Wait for an actual yes. Not a hum, not a “sure.” The yes is what lets you ask ten questions without it feeling like an interrogation.

“Before we get into it — what made you take this call?”

Write their answer down word for word. You will repeat it back to them in Phase 4, and it will land harder than anything you could write yourself.

LISTEN FOR

- Their language for the problem — “outdated,” “embarrassed,” “doesn't look like us.”
- Whether they volunteer a trigger event (a competitor, a bad month, a rebrand).

DO NOT

- Pitch. Mention price. Talk about yourself.
- If they ask “so what do you do?” — “I'll show you in about ten minutes and it'll make more sense once I understand your setup. Can I ask you a few things first?”

The longest phase, and the one people skip. Ask in this order. Write down every number — you cannot do Phase 3 without them.

1 "Walk me through how a new client finds you and ends up on your table."

Let them narrate the whole path. Don't interrupt. This one question answers four of the ones below.

2 "Roughly how many new clients do you get in a month?"

3 "Of those, how many come from the website versus Instagram versus word of mouth?"

If they don't know: "Ballpark — closer to a quarter, or closer to three-quarters?"

4 "What's a new client actually worth to you — first visit, and then over a year if they stick around?"

The single most important number on this call. Get both figures. If they hesitate, ask what a typical first treatment runs, then how often people come back.

5 "When someone decides they want to book, what do they do — click something, or call you?"

6 "And who answers the phone when you're in a room with a client?"

Follow with: "So what happens to that call?" Sit in the silence. This is usually where the deal is.

7 "What's your busiest treatment, and what's the one you wish you sold more of?"

The second half is what you build a service page for in Phase 4.

8 "Last time you sent someone to your website — a referral, someone from Instagram — how confident were you it made you look as good as you actually are?"

9 "If we did this and it worked, what would that look like six months from now?"

Their answer is the success criterion you write into the agreement.

10 "Other than you, who's involved in a decision like this?"

Ask this before you pitch, never after. Finding a second decision-maker at the close costs you the deal; finding one now just means you invite them.

LISTEN FOR

- The missed-call answer. Nine times out of ten it's "it goes to voicemail" and nine times out of ten nobody calls back.
- The annual client value. This is the denominator for your price.
- Anything they say twice. That's the thing they actually care about.

DO NOT

- Correct them, even when they're wrong about their own numbers.
- Sell inside a question. "Don't you think a better site would..." is not a question.
- Fill silence. After you ask, stop. Count to five. They will keep talking, and the second half is the honest half.

Make the number theirs. You are not persuading — you are adding up figures they just handed you, out loud, and asking them to check your work.

“Can I do some quick math out loud, and you tell me if I’m off?”

“You said about [40] new clients a month, and roughly [a third] of them find you online — so call that [13] a month. And a client’s worth about [$400] on the first visit and [$2,000] over a year. So your website is already responsible for something like [$62,000] a year in first visits, [$310,000] if they stay. Does that feel about right, or am I high?”

Round conservatively and always ask “am I high?” — you want them arguing that your number is too low. Once they’ve corrected you upward, the number is theirs, not yours.

“Here’s the part I’d push on. I booked an appointment on your site last night before we talked — it took [four taps and a phone call], and the call would’ve gone to voicemail at 2pm on a Tuesday. Every step between ‘I want this’ and ‘I’m booked’ loses people. So the question isn’t whether the site works. It’s what one more booking a week is worth to you.”

Then be quiet and let them do that multiplication themselves. If they say it out loud, you’ve already won the price conversation.

THE DISCIPLINE THAT MAKES THIS CREDIBLE

Use only their numbers. Round down. Never cite a statistic, a study, or an industry average — the moment you do, this stops being arithmetic about their business and becomes a pitch. You are sizing the prize, not guaranteeing a result. Do not promise a conversion percentage you cannot control.

Every item you name is tied to something they said. Open by quoting them back to themselves.

"You said [their exact words from Phase 1]. And you told me [the missed-call thing]. So here's what I'd build."

NAME THREE TO FIVE THINGS — NO MORE

- The site itself. "Your clinic feels like [what they described]. Your website feels like [what it actually feels like]. That gap is the whole project."
- Booking in one tap, from every page, wired into [their system]. Nobody should ever have to call you to give you money.
- A before-and-after gallery that loads fast and doesn't look like a dermatology textbook.
- A real page for [the treatment they wish they sold more of] — the one you told me you want to grow.

Pull up your own site on the shared screen.

"This is the standard we build at. Not a template with your logo dropped in."

"Anything in there you'd cut? Or anything obvious I'm missing?"

Get them editing the scope. A client who edits the scope has already decided to buy it — they're just negotiating the shape.

DO NOT

- List technologies. They don't care what it's built in, and naming the stack invites their nephew who "does websites."
- Say "AI," "automation," or "retainer" on this call. You are selling a website. Everything else is a conversation you get to have after you've delivered one.

Real number first, flat, no apology, then stop talking. The discount only has value because the real price came before it.

“For a build like this, we’re [$12,000 to $16,000] — or [$3,500 a month] if you’d rather we own it ongoing instead of handing it off.”

Now stop. Do not explain, justify, or soften. Do not fill the pause with a discount. Whoever speaks first loses this one, and it is genuinely uncomfortable — that’s why it works.

“Now — I’ll be straight with you about where we are. We’re taking on two clinics in the aesthetics space right now at half, so [$6,000] instead of [$12,000]. That’s not charity and it’s not a discount I’ll repeat. In exchange I want three things: you track your bookings for ninety days before and after so we both have real numbers, a testimonial if it works, and permission to publish it as a case study with your name on it. After these two clinics, it’s full price.”

Say “after these two, it’s full price” out loud. It’s the only thing that makes the deadline real.

WHY THE SEQUENCE MATTERS MORE THAN THE NUMBER

Fifty percent off a stated price is a positioning move — it says the work is worth twelve and you’re buying proof. Fifty percent off a number you never said is just a cheap website, and it prices every job after it. If you only remember one line from this document, it’s this one.

Verbatim answers. Read them until they're yours. The first one decides most of your calls right now.

“WHO ELSE HAVE YOU DONE THIS FOR? THE ONE THAT MATTERS”

“Nobody in aesthetics yet — you'd be the first, and that's exactly why you're getting it at half. I'm not going to pretend I have ten clinics I don't have. What I can do is let you judge the work instead of the résumé: here's what we build (show your site), and if you want, I'll build one real page of your site — your branding, your photos — before you pay me anything.”

Only offer the free page if they push twice. It's your fallback lever, not your opener — and if you offer it, actually ship it inside 48 hours or it costs you more than saying no would have.

“HOW OLD ARE YOU?”

“I'm nineteen. Look at the work and tell me if it's the standard you want for your clinic — and if it isn't, don't hire me.”

Say the number. Flat, no defensiveness, then move immediately back to the work. Dodging is what turns your age into a real objection; owning it in one sentence usually ends it.

“WE ALREADY HAVE A WEBSITE.”

“I know — I went through it before this call. [The one specific flaw from Phase 0.] The question was never whether you have one. It's whether it's converting. You told me about [13] people a month find you online. What's one more a week worth?”

“EVERYONE COMES THROUGH REFERRALS.”

“That's the best problem to have. But every referral still looks you up before they book. The site isn't what gets you the referral — it's what decides whether the referral actually shows up. And right now it's [four taps] to book.”

“IT'S TOO EXPENSIVE.”

“Compared to what? You said a client's worth [$2,000] a year to you. This is three clients.”

Then be quiet. If it's genuinely cashflow and not value, split it — half up front, half at launch. Restructure the payment, never cut the price a second time.

“I NEED TO THINK ABOUT IT.”

“Totally fair. What specifically — the money, the timing, or whether it'll actually work?”

Then answer only that one thing. “I need to think about it” is never the objection; it's the wrapper around one of those three.

“SEND ME A PROPOSAL.”

“I'll have it to you today. Before I write it — if it says exactly what we just talked about, at the number I just gave you, is there anything that would stop you from starting?”

Their answer is the real objection, and this is your last chance to hear it while you still have them on the phone. A proposal sent before you've asked this is a proposal into the void.

7 CLOSE

48:00 – 55:00

Assume it. Don't ask for the sale — narrate what happens next and end on a question where both answers are yes.

“Okay — here's what happens next. I'll send the agreement over today, you sign it, and I start [Monday]. What I need from you before then is your logo files, brand colours, five good photos of the space, your service list, and your booking link. You'll have a first draft in your hands in [seven days] and be live in under three weeks. Does [Monday] work, or is [the week after] cleaner on your end?”

The last sentence is the close. Two options, both of them a yes. If you feel the urge to add “...if that sounds good?” — don't.

If they hesitate:

“What's the piece that isn't sitting right?”

NEVER END A CALL WITH “I’LL FOLLOW UP”

Book the next thing while they're still on the phone and say the date out loud. A follow-up you scheduled is a deal; a follow-up you intended is a lost one.

8 IF IT'S A NO

2 MIN

A no with a reason is worth more to you right now than a maybe. You have few enough calls that every one has to teach you something.

“No problem — honestly I'd rather you tell me no than go quiet on me. Can I ask what tipped it?”

“Last thing and then I'll leave you alone. If I built one page of your site — your branding, no charge, no commitment — and it was better than what you've got, would that change anything?”

“Understood. I'll check in around [90 days]. If anything changes before then you've got my number.”

Then actually check back in ninety days. Set it in the pipeline before you put the phone down.

The call is worth roughly nothing if the numbers live in your head. Do this before you do anything else.

- Log it in the pipeline — new clients per month, share from web, first-visit value, annual value, their exact words for the problem, the objection that actually landed, and the next action with a date on it.
- Send the follow-up inside two hours, while you're still a real person to them. Recap their own numbers back at them, restate the price, attach the agreement.
- If it was a no, set the ninety-day reminder now, not later.
- Write down the one question you wish you'd asked. Add it to Phase 2. This document should be different after ten calls than it is today.

THE WHOLE CALL, ONE PAGE

KEEP THIS ONE OPEN ON YOUR PHONE

0:00 1 FRAME

Set the agenda, get an actual yes, ask what made them take the call. Write their words down.

2:00 2 DIAGNOSE

Ten questions in order. New clients/month · share from web · first-visit value · annual value · who answers the phone · who else decides.

20:00 3 THE MATH

Add up their numbers out loud. "Does that feel right, or am I high?" Then the tap count and the voicemail.

28:00 4 PRESENT

Quote them back. Three to five things, each tied to something they said. Show your site. "Anything you'd cut?"

40:00 5 PRICE

$12–16k, or $3,500/mo. Silence. Then: two clinics at half, in exchange for tracked numbers, a testimonial, and a named case study.

— 6 OBJECTIONS

"Nobody in aesthetics yet — that's why it's half." · "I'm nineteen, judge the work." · "Compared to what?" · "Money, timing, or whether it'll work?"

48:00 7 CLOSE

Narrate the next steps, list what you need from them, end on "Monday or the week after?"

— 8 IF NO

"What tipped it?" Offer the one free page. Set the 90-day reminder before you hang up.

Same day 9 DEBRIEF

Log every number. Follow up within two hours. Add the question you wish you'd asked.

They talk 70%. Their numbers, not yours. Real price before the discount.
