

SOVEREIGN

THE SET COLD CALL TO BOOKED MEETING

The dialing script. Med spas and aesthetics clinics. Every phase exists to get one thing: a confirmed thirty minutes on the calendar.

COLD CALL

UNDER 3 MINUTES PER CONVERSATION

SETTER-RUN

THE ONLY RULE THAT MATTERS

You are not selling a website. You are selling thirty minutes.

The moment you start explaining what Sovereign builds, you have stopped setting and started pitching — and you will lose, because you're pitching without any of their numbers. Curiosity and a calendar slot. Nothing else.

Breaking any of these costs the closer the deal before he ever picks up the phone. They are not guidelines.

NEVER, ON A SETTING CALL

1. Never say a price. Not a range, not a “starts around,” not “it’s cheaper than you’d think.” A number from you is a number the closer has to negotiate down from.
2. Never promise a result or a timeline. No “we’ll double your bookings,” no “live in two weeks.”
3. Never send a proposal, a deck, or a portfolio link instead of booking. Information is what people ask for when they want you off the phone.
4. Never book someone who isn’t the decision-maker. A meeting with a receptionist is worse than no meeting — it burns an hour and teaches you nothing.
5. Never book to hit your number. A junk set costs the closer sixty minutes and costs you the only thing you actually have, which is that your sets are worth showing up to.

WHAT YOU ARE ALLOWED TO SAY ABOUT PRICE

“Honestly, it depends entirely on what you need — that’s the whole reason for the call.” Then go straight back to asking for the calendar slot. Every time, no exceptions, no matter how hard they push.

1 BEFORE YOU DIAL

60 SEC PER LEAD

Sixty seconds. Not ten minutes — deep research is the closer’s job, and doing it here is just an excuse not to dial.

THREE THINGS OFF THEIR SITE, NOTHING MORE

- The owner’s first name. Google Business profile, the About page, or the Instagram bio. Calling and asking for “the owner” marks you as a cold caller in four words.
- Can you book online, yes or no? If the only way to book is a phone number, that is your entire opener and you don’t need anything else.
- One specific flaw you can name in a sentence. The gallery takes forever to load. The pricing is a PDF. It’s a template you’ve seen on three other clinics this week.

WHEN TO CALL

- Mid-morning Tuesday through Thursday, or the first twenty minutes after they open.
- Avoid Monday before 11, lunch, and anything after 4pm.
- Call the same number at a different time of day before you write it off. Three attempts, three different windows.

DO NOT

- Build a perfect list. Fifty decent numbers you actually dial beats two hundred you research forever.
- Read their reviews, count their followers, or look up the owner on LinkedIn. That’s Phase 0 of the closing call, not this one.

Get to the owner. Confidence, not permission — you're not asking to be let in, you're assuming you already are.

THEY PICK UP

"Hey — is [Owner first name] around?"

Casual, like you've called before. Not "May I please speak with the owner." In a small clinic there's a good chance the person answering is the owner.

"WHAT'S THIS REGARDING?"

"It's about the website — [Name] will know. Is she in?"

True, short, and unhelpful enough that pressing further is more work than putting you through.

"SHE'S WITH A CLIENT."

"No problem — when's she usually free, mornings or afternoons?"

Get the window, then hang up and call in that window. Do not leave a message on the first attempt.

DO NOT

- Pitch the front desk. They can't say yes, only no.
- Apologise, or open with "Sorry to bother you." You're not sorry and it primes them to say no.
- Leave your message on call one or two. Names get taken and never delivered.

Thirty seconds. Ask for permission, name one specific thing, refuse to fix it on the phone.

“Hey [Name], this is [You] with Sovereign — you don't know me. Can I have thirty seconds and then you can tell me to get lost?”

Almost nobody says no to this. It also resets the call: you've admitted it's cold, so you're no longer pretending, and they stop listening for the trick.

“We build websites for aesthetics clinics. I went through yours before I called, and there's one thing on there I think is quietly costing you bookings — [the one specific flaw]. I'm not going to try and fix that over the phone. What I'd rather do is get thirty minutes on the calendar with [Jackson, our founder / me], who'll walk you through exactly what he'd change and what it would cost. Worth a look?”

WHY IT WORKS

- You looked at their site. That alone separates you from every other call they get this week.
- “I'm not going to fix it on the phone” is the line that makes the meeting the only way to find out.
- Naming what happens on the call — what he'd change, what it costs — makes the thirty minutes concrete instead of a sales trap.

DO NOT

- Name two flaws. One is a reason to meet; two is a pitch, and a pitch invites a decision now.
- Explain how you'd fix it. The second you do, the meeting has no purpose.
- Say “AI,” “SEO,” “funnel,” or “digital marketing.” Every one of those words has been burned by someone who called them last month.

Two questions. You are protecting the closer's calendar, and this is the part that makes your sets worth taking.

"Before I put time on the calendar — are you the one who'd make the call on something like this, or is there a partner involved?"

If there's a partner: "Makes sense — should we get them on it too? Easier than you relaying it." Book both or don't book.

"And roughly how many providers do you have on staff?"

A proxy for size you can ask without asking about money. A solo injector working out of a rented room is a different business than a six-provider clinic with two locations.

BOOK IT IF

- You have the owner or a partner who can decide, on the phone or committed to attending.
- They've been open more than a year.
- There's staff beyond the owner, or more than one location, or they're clearly running paid ads.

IF THEY DON'T CLEAR THE BAR

"Honestly, sounds like you're a bit earlier than the clinics we usually work with. Can I check back in six months?"

Log it with the date. Walking away from a set you could have forced is the single clearest signal that your sets mean something.

WHY THE BAR EXISTS

A premium build only makes sense for a clinic where the website is a real part of how they get clients. Below that, the money isn't there, and the meeting ends in a no that costs an hour and dents the closer's read on every set you send after it.

Two specific times. Never an open question. Then get the invite in their inbox before you hang up.

"I've got [Thursday at 2], or [Friday morning] — which is easier?"

Never "would you be open to a call sometime?" An open question gets an open answer, which is a no with better manners.

"Perfect. What's the best email? I'll send the invite right now while we're on the phone — tell me when it lands."

Send it before you hang up and make them confirm they can see it. This one habit does more against no-shows than every reminder you send afterwards combined.

"Last thing so I'm not wasting your Thursday — anything that would stop you making it?"

Flushes out the soft yes while you can still do something about it.

A MEETING THAT ISN'T CONFIRMED ISN'T BOOKED

Invite accepted, or a text back the morning of. If neither has happened, it doesn't go on the board as a set.

Short. Every answer ends by going back to the two times. You're not winning an argument — you're removing one reason not to book.

“HOW MUCH DOES IT COST? THE TRAP”

“It depends completely on what you need — a refresh and a full rebuild aren't the same job. That's the whole point of the thirty minutes: [he] gives you a real number based on your clinic, not a guess from me over the phone. Thursday at 2, or Friday morning?”

They will push twice. Give the same answer the second time, word for word. Any number you say becomes the ceiling.

“WE'RE NOT INTERESTED.”

“Fair enough — most people aren't when I call. Can I ask, is it that you're happy with the site, or just that now's a bad time?”

“Not interested” is a reflex, not an answer. This question turns it into one, and one of the two is workable.

“I'M WITH A CLIENT RIGHT NOW. MOST COMMON”

“Of course — I'll get out of your way. Is later today or tomorrow morning better for a thirty-second call?”

Get a time, hang up fast, and call exactly then. Calling back when you said you would is itself a credential.

“JUST SEND ME SOME INFORMATION.”

“I can, but anything I send you now is generic — it's the same thing I'd send anyone. Give me thirty minutes and you'll get something about your clinic. Thursday or Friday?”

“WE JUST REDID OUR WEBSITE.”

“Good — then this'll be a short call. When did you redo it, and have bookings actually gone up since?”

If it was genuinely recent and genuinely working, don't force it. Log the date and revisit. If bookings haven't moved, you've just found the reason to meet.

“WE'VE GOT SOMEONE WHO HANDLES THAT.”

“Makes sense — in-house, or an agency? ... And when you need something changed on the site, how fast do they get back to you?”

The answer is almost always “eventually.” That's your door — don't attack the incumbent, just let them describe them.

“WHERE DID YOU GET MY NUMBER?”

“Your Google listing. I called because I looked at your site, not because I bought a list.”

Say it flat and move straight on. Only true if it is true — so make it true.

7 NO ANSWER & VOICEMAIL

15 SEC

No message on attempts one or two. Different times of day beat repeated messages.

ATTEMPT THREE ONLY

“ [Name] , it's [You] at Sovereign, [385-695-8044] . I went through your website and there's one thing on it I think is costing you bookings. Takes me thirty seconds to explain. [385-695-8044] .”

Say the number twice, at the start and the end, slowly. Say nothing else — no company description, no pitch, no “hope you're having a great day.”

THEN STOP

Three attempts, three different times, one voicemail. After that they go back in the pipeline with a ninety-day date on them. Chasing a cold number more than that is how you avoid dialing new ones.

8 THE HANDOFF

2 MIN · IMMEDIATELY AFTER

Write it down before the next dial. If the closer walks in blind, the set was worth nothing.

INTO THE PIPELINE, EVERY TIME

- Owner's name, and who else is attending.
- The one thing you named — the exact flaw you used to get their attention. The closer opens on it.
- Provider count, locations, how long they've been open.
- Anything they said about their current site, in their own words.
- The objection you had to get past. It will come back on the closing call, and the closer should see it coming.

TWO SENTENCES IS ENOUGH

“Owner Sarah, three injectors, one location, open four years. Booked her on the fact you can't book online — she said she knows and it's been on her list for a year. Pushed on price twice.”

Four numbers. Written down, every session, no exceptions — they're the only way to know which phase is actually broken.

Dials	Every number touched, including no-answers.
--------------	---

Conversations	Decision-maker actually on the phone. Front desk doesn't count.
----------------------	---

Sets	Confirmed, invite accepted or texted back.
-------------	--

Held	They showed up. This is the only number that pays.

READING THE BOARD

Low conversations-per-dial is a list or a timing problem, not a script problem. High conversations but low sets means the opener or the ask is soft — that's Phase 3 and Phase 5. Good sets but poor held rate means you're not confirming on the phone, which is Phase 5. Fix one at a time.

ON EXPECTATIONS

Cold dialing to small local businesses is a low-single-digit game — assume something in the range of a hundred dials to a couple of confirmed sets until your own data says otherwise. Treat that as a placeholder, not a benchmark: after three hundred dials you'll have real ratios, and those replace this paragraph. Judging the script on one bad session is how good scripts get thrown out.

THE UNCOMFORTABLE PART

1. Volume is the whole game. A hundred dials a week is a setting motion. Twenty is a hobby, and no script rescues twenty.
2. The first fifty calls are tuition. You will be bad at them. Make them anyway, and make them early in the week so the rest of the week is better.
3. Nobody has ever talked themselves into being ready to dial. The block goes in the calendar and you dial through it.

THE CALL ON ONE PAGE

TAPE THIS TO THE DESK

1 RECON · 60 SEC

Owner's first name · can you book online · one specific flaw.

2 FRONT DESK

"Hey — is [Name] around?" · "It's about the website, she'll know." · "When's she usually free, mornings or afternoons?"

3 OPENER

"You don't know me. Thirty seconds and you can tell me to get lost." → one flaw → "I'm not going to fix it on the phone." → "Worth a look?"

4 QUALIFY

"Are you the one who'd make the call, or is there a partner?" · "How many providers on staff?" · Open 12+ months.

5 ASK

"Thursday at 2, or Friday morning?" → email → send the invite on the phone → "Anything that would stop you making it?"

6 PRICE QUESTION

"Depends what you need — that's the point of the call." Same answer twice. Never a number.

7 VOICEMAIL

Attempt three only. Name, number, one flaw, number again. Fifteen seconds.

8 HANDOFF

The one thing you named · provider count · the objection you beat. Two sentences, before the next dial.

9 BOARD

Dials · conversations · sets · held.

You're selling thirty minutes. Never a price. Never an open question.
